If you live in a part of the world that is experiencing winter right now, it might be snowing. Picture that you are having a snowball fight with your friends. A snowball is, of course, a ball of snow. But not all snow makes good snowballs. If the snow is too light and dry, it will not hold together. It is powdery. Wetter snow makes for great snowballs. You can pack it into a tight ball, which is great for throwing. A snowball might hurt a bit, but it would not cause a lot of damage. But imagine that snowball rolling down a hill. As it rolls, it picks up more and more snow. It gets bigger and bigger until it hits something and causes damage! This is so called "snowball effect." A snowball effect is a situation where one action or event causes many other similar actions or events. And these actions or events grow and grow bigger and more problematic -- just like a snowball rolling down a hill. Next time, when you play with snow, don't forget that these beautiful light snowflakes can also lead to something big!

We all know that coffee is made from beans, but did you know that there are actually two different types of coffee beans? Arabica (阿拉比卡) and Robusta (羅布斯塔) are the two most common types of coffee beans, and each has its own unique flavor profile. So, which is better? Arabica or Robusta coffee?

To answer this question, we first need to understand the difference between these two types of coffee beans. Arabica beans are the most popular type of coffee bean in the world. More than 60% of all coffee production uses Arabica beans, which are prized for their mellow flavor and wonderful aroma. The Arabica plant is a native of Ethiopia, but today it is grown in many countries around the world, such as Brazil, Colombia, and Guatemala. Arabica beans are harvested when they are bright red in color, and they are usually roasted at a lower temperature than other types of coffee beans. This helps to keep the bean's special flavor profiles. While Arabica beans are often enjoyed on their own, they can also be blended with other coffee beans to create rich flavor profiles.

Robusta beans are a type of coffee bean that is used to make a strong, full-bodied coffee. These beans have a higher caffeine content than other types of coffee beans, and they often have a bitter taste. Robusta beans are grown in Vietnam, Brazil, and India, and they make up about 30% of the world's coffee production. While some coffee drinkers enjoy the heavy flavor of Robusta coffee, others find it too strong. In order to balance out the bitterness, many coffee roasters mix Robusta beans with other types of beans, such as Arabica beans. The flavor after blending is usually more mellow and easier to drink. Whether you like it strong or weak, it's for sure that Robusta coffee plays an important role.

So, which is better, Arabica or Robusta coffee? After all, people who have different personal tastes make different choices. If you like a sweeter, more gentle flavor, then Arabica coffee is probably a better choice for you. However, if you love a stronger, more intense flavor, then Robusta coffee might be a better option. Whichever coffee you choose, hope you enjoy it.
